

PROJECT CHRONAUT

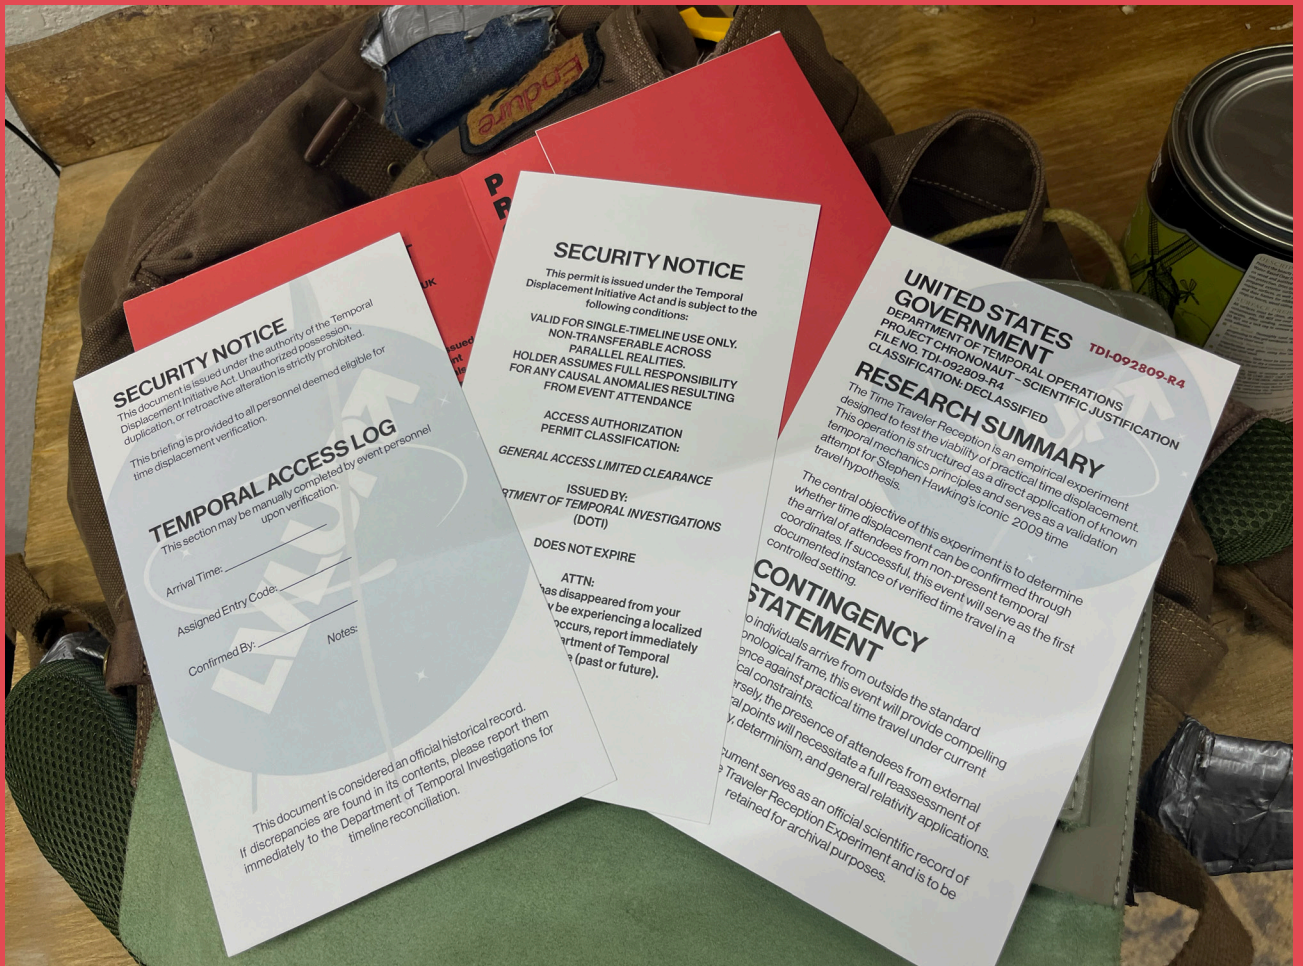

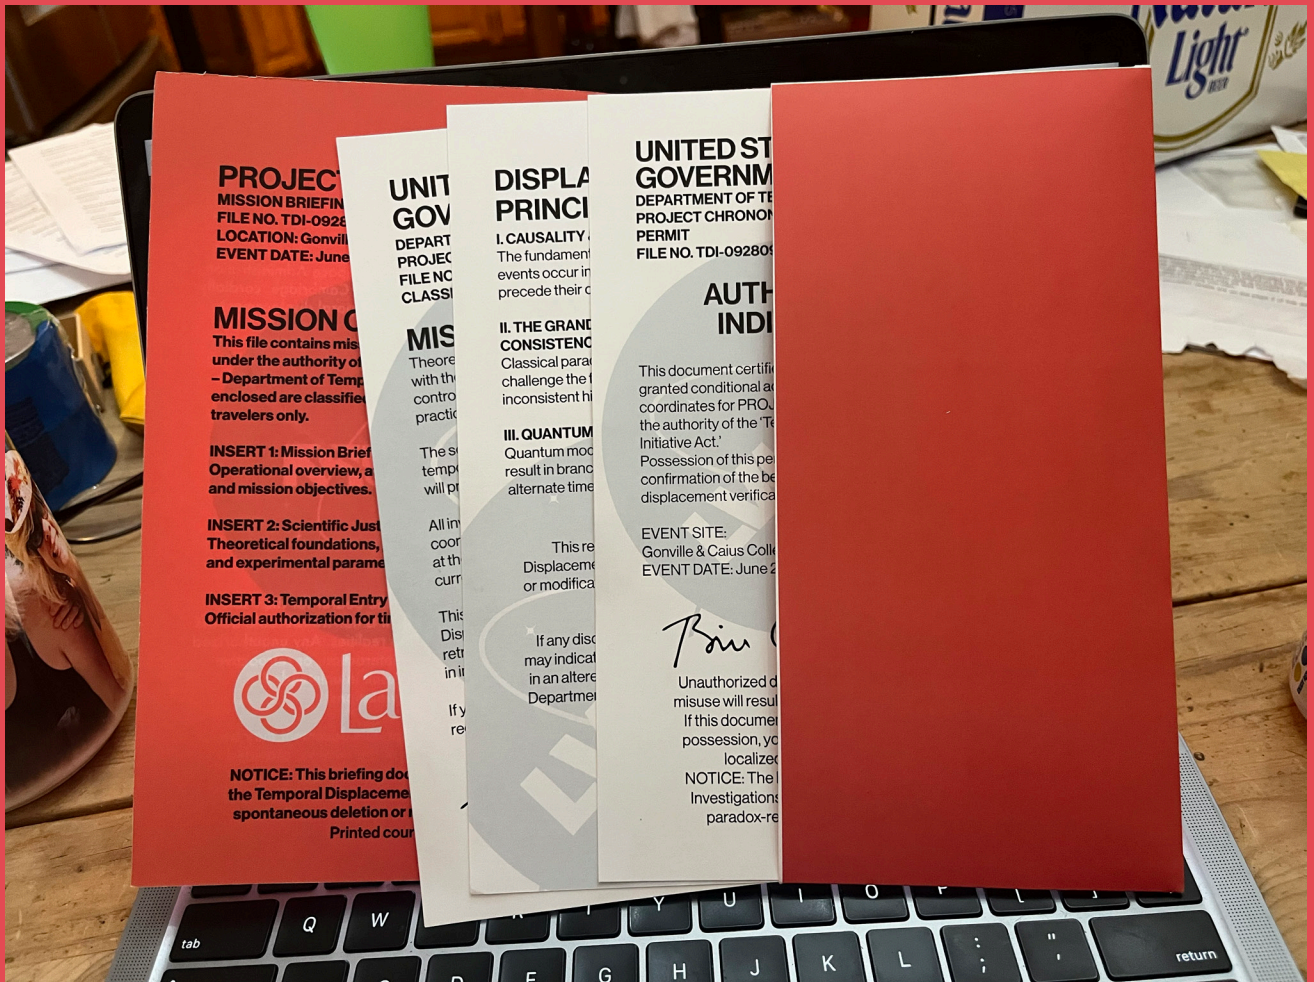

A homemade, speculative credential for a time travel experiment, designed like it came out of some alternate version of NASA. I wanted it to feel real, a cross between an invitation, a boarding pass, and a Cold War-era warning label. The goal was to build something that looked official — kind of absurd, kind of mysterious, a certain kind of cool.

intentionally deadpan: a temporal access pass with warnings about paradoxes and timeline violations. An understating of of bureaucracy in sci-fi — like you'd need government clearance just to exist in the wrong decade.

Visually, I leaned into that retro-futurist space aesthetic: bold red, orbit rings, stars, and chunky typography. Everything was designed to feel like it meant something, even if you couldn't quite tell what.

PROJECT CHRONAUT

PROJECT CHRONAUT

This project ended up winning the Lawton Scholarship, which was a pretty surreal moment. It felt like a small, weird idea that hit the right balance of concept and craft.

